

The Far Field: Nature as Panacea for female voices

Shreya Pandey, PhD student of Sharda School of Humanities & Social Sciences ShardaUniversity, India 2025372868.shreya@dr.sharda.ac.in

Dr.Pramod Kumar, Professor, Sharda School of Humanities & Social Sciences ShardaUniversity, India pramod.kumar1@sharda.ac.in

Abstract

This study addresses the agency and space given to the characters in the novel The Far Field by Madhuri Vijay. Nature depicts different voices of characters of different castes and classes. The study explores the inner grief, alienation, and oppression of females through the environment. Writers have used nature to portray inner feelings and emotions about love-war and life-death. The symbolism is deeply rooted in the past of mankind. In the study, the landscape acts as a mirror of inner turmoil. The ecofeminist perspectives have been discussed where both nature and women are being marginalised and misunderstood by patriarchal and political systems. The study deeply awares about nature only as a healer but acts as a spiritual and moral panacea and gives space for redemption and reflection. Nature operates as a panacea for psychological fragmentation and moral confusion and heals by offering stillness, perspective, continuity in contrast to human chaos.

Keywords: Nature, Marginalisation, Female voices, Panacea